WEATHER OF CONCERN

Weather of Concern

- An extended period of elevated to critical fire weather conditions is expected this week across Southwest California. A tightening northerly pressure gradient will generate increasing north winds Tuesday afternoon into Tuesday night with lowering humidity and bringing potential critical fire weather conditions.

Active Weather Warnings, Watches and Advisories by County:

http://www.wrh.noaa.gov/sto/brief/wwa_bc_cal.php

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

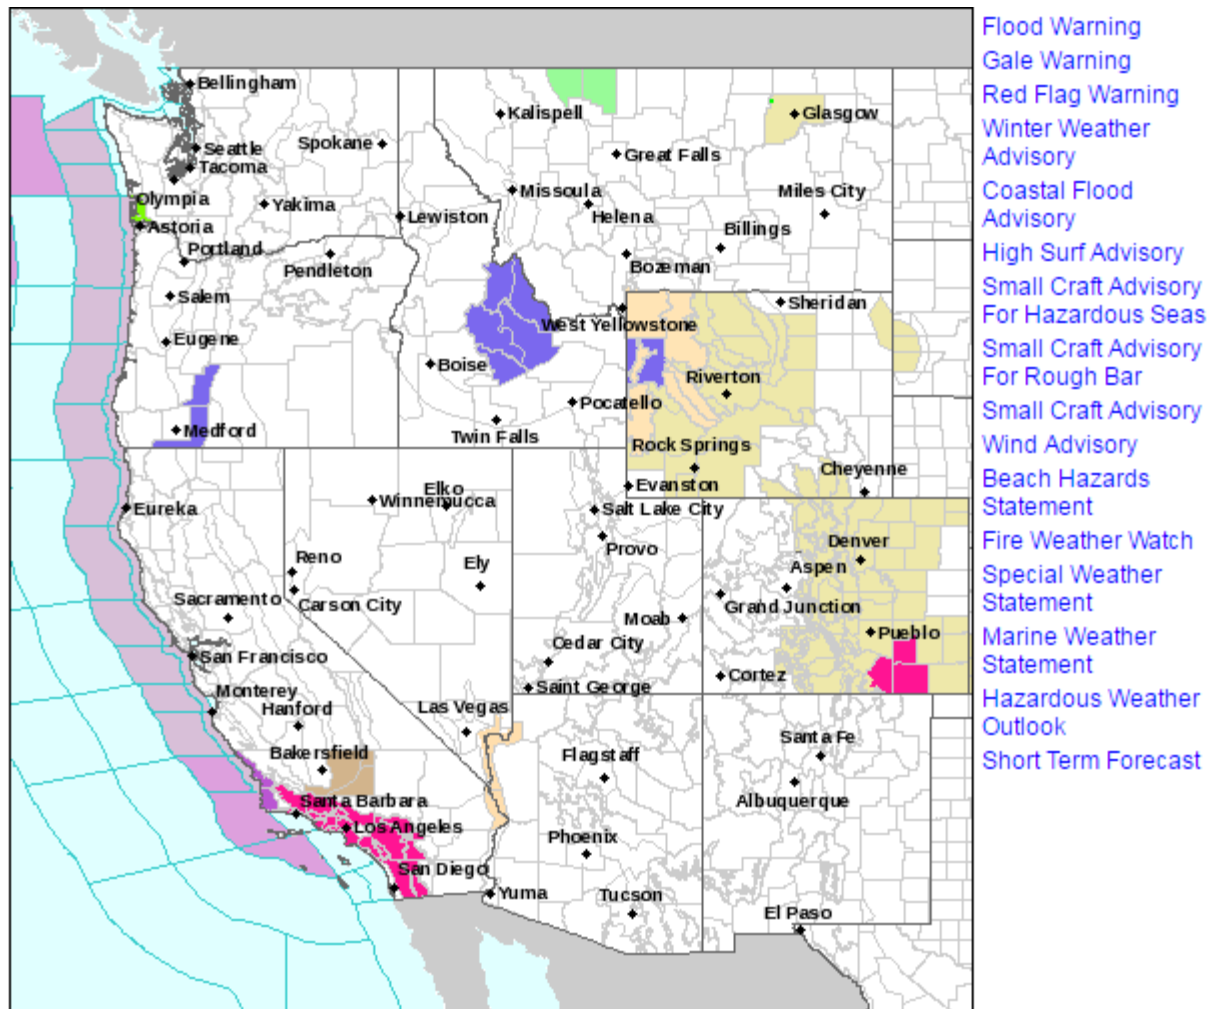

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

The last of a series of weather systems will be moving east through the region today with some more showers, mainly this morning. A high pressure ridge will arrive along the coast tonight and move inland over the next few days. The weather will become warmer and be dry. Some gusty north to northeast winds will also develop tonight for the favored areas in the Sacramento Valley and surrounding foothills. Local gusts up around 28 mph are expected. These winds will become quite a bit lighter Wednesday and linger into early Thursday. Although quite a bit of drying is expected in the windy areas, the duration will be pretty short and the drying effects are not likely to be sufficient to dry fuels out enough to elevate fire potential by much. Thursday the ridge will be over the Great Basin, and we will be in between weather systems. Some cloudiness and a slight chance of showers will return to the far northwest corner of the state while the rest of the region remains mostly sunny. A low pressure trough will be off shore Friday, but things will probably continue to be about the same as Thursday except cooler. The trough will hang off shore through the weekend with periods of variable cloudiness over the region. The far northern areas may see a few showers, and there will be periods of moderately gusty southerly winds develop. More cloudiness and showers will gradually spread across the region early next week for cooler and moister weather again then.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

A quick shift from cool, rainy weather to hot and dry weather will begin today. Gusty northwesterly winds of 25-35 mph are occurring early this morning across the Kern County Mountains and the Antelope Valley. Expect these winds to transition to the north later today as the trough which brought precipitation moves east of the area. This will allow gusty north winds of 20-35 mph to develop across the I-5 Corridor and northern Los Angeles County this afternoon into the evening hours. Similar wind speeds may also develop by this afternoon across Santa Barbara County. Expect temperatures to climb 5-10 degrees today under sunny skies. Tonight, gradients will shift to the northeast, allowing offshore winds of 20-30 mph with higher gusts to develop across portions of Southern California. These winds may peak in strength Wednesday morning and again Wednesday night into Thursday morning. At the current time, models suggest the strongest winds may occur from northern Los Angeles County into Ventura County near Highway 126. Other windy areas will include the Cajon Pass and the Santa Ana Canyon. Temperatures will reach the 90s across many coastal and valley areas of Southern California Wednesday with temperatures near 100 possible Thursday afternoon. Relative Humidity (RH) will be in the single digits across most coastal and intermediate valleys of Central and Southern California. Expect little, if any, RH recovery over most of Southern California Wednesday and Thursday night. The offshore gradients are expected to relax late Thursday night which should allow weaker winds by Friday. Temperatures will begin to cool off at the coast Friday with most areas seeing readings fall back into the 80s by Saturday. It will also be very warm along the central coast Wednesday and Thursday where highs will be in the 90s as well. Meanwhile, in the San Joaquin Valley, expect the season's first widespread fog episode to begin tonight, but clearer weather will return by the weekend. A weak impulse may bring much cooler weather with a slight chance of light rain by next Monday.
